Homemakers Items

Do you have a killer lurking in your home?

The housewife may bring a number of potential killers into her home each time she returns from the grocery store, drug store, hardware store, or cleaners, according to Amelia H. Fuller, home management specialist at VPI.

She points out that many products used in the home contain dangerous chemicals or potential hazards which can be deadly killers. Among these products are medicines, bleaching solutions, floor cleaners, waxes, furniture polishes, cleaning solvents, paints and lacquers, paint removers, deodorants, detergents, ammonia, disinfectants, rug cleaners, rust and tarnish removers, metal polishes, moth balls, weed killers, insect repellants, and poisons for insects and vermin.

Knowing which are dangerous is a problem, for thousands of products now on the market carry no signal or words to guide the consumer about possible dangers if mishandled.

The American Medical Association has become alarmed with the increase in deaths and injuries resulting from the misuse of these products. A committee from the association spent 15 months studying the situation and state laws which have been passed to protect the consumer.

Their findings have been turned over to the AMA with recommendations for action. They note the consumer has limited protection under present laws. For example, over one-half of the substances causing accidental death or injury are not required by law to carry precautionary labeling. Over three-fourts of the products tested contained substances which are toxic.

Chairman of the committee, Dr. Torald Sollman, said, "Federal laws are useful as far as they go; however, they are far from adequate. There are loopholes that need closing; gaps that need filling in."

The committee backed up-to-date laws on informative labeling with uniform laws throughout the country. It has prepared a model law.

The law would require labeling of hazardous chemicals, listing harmful ingredients with a warning of their potential harm. Directions for proper use would be required and emergency instructions for first aid should be given, according to the committee.

Several bills for uniform laws have been put into the congressional hopper, but have failed to pass. The medical assocaitions and 60 national organizations have studied and approved the model law prepared by the AMA committee.

They believe this law would make it easier to educate the general public and that improvements in one state could be passed on to all.

Mrs. O. W. Martin Jr. and Mrs. Clarke Moore attended the Conference at Memorial Methodist Church at Appomattox Monday evening.

They say that fair, impartial, uniform enforcement would give equal protection to every consumer.

Miss Fuller believes that every consumer should understand and support the idea of a uniform law.

Mr. and Mrs. Hazel Campbell and Mr. and Mrs. Jessie Campbell were Sunday dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Moore.

FRAUD CHARGED

The Government has accused General Motors and the Libby-Owens-Ford Glass Company of using camera trickery in television commercials boosting the glass used in G. M. cars.

The glass firm has denied the charges and attributed the complaints to its competitors.

RADIATION LIMITS

International agreement has been reached on permissible radiation exposure for the general public.

The agreement by the principal scientific advisory groups on radiation protection would in effect leave the exposure limits at the present recommended levels.
